

Reflection

Throughout this half term so far, I have learnt about the Windrush generation, immigrants and how the Windrush people were treated. The Windrush generation were invited to Britain to come and help but they got discriminated. They did not get any British passports and were not able to get any jobs. The people who were born in Britain but had parents as immigrants got treated better than their parents. Some people were even shipped back to their own country.

We had a debate about immigration. There were many factors raised and it was rather interesting. One of the subjects was 'culture'. If we did not have any immigrants, then we will only have the same culture. On the other hand, if there were too many immigrants then the people in their own country, then there will be less of an opportunity for jobs. This debate taught me that there are pros and cons for immigration.

For our homework last week, we had to make a poster about a coloured person, who changed people's lives. I chose an amazing person called 'Harriett Tubman' because she helped so many captured slaves. She gave them freedom. She taught me never to give up and persevere. All of this made me empathise with the Windrush generation because in every activity, we had to understand how they felt. The key message of this topic is that we should all have our equal rights and treat people equally. At the end of the day, we are all the same - humans.
